2D - Analytical Account

In Southern and South/Southern Africa economic coordination is widely perceived as important to creating an economic environment favourable to enhanced productive sector activity and entrepreneurial initiative. Some aspects of SADCC's sectoral approach relate to this potential but the means to achieving serious enterprise participation in defining and pursuing policies and programmes remains elusive. The means to integrating or agreeing on a division of labour among present South and Southern African coordination institutions — notably SADCC, PTA, Southern African Development Bank (including South Africa's relationship with EEC and Lome Convention) are potentially important in this respect.

Yill

R. H. Green 1992-1993

Programme I Portion

Reg Green's main focus of work in 1992-1993 has been on the interaction among natural calamities (especially drought), man-made catastrophes (especially war), absolute poverty and public policy. The focus has been applied analytically as Senior Social Policy Advisor to the Mozambique Planning Commission and consultant to UNICEF on South African Programme development, converting the Children's Summit Goals into a programming dynamic in SSA and looking forward to 1994-96 livelihood rehabilitation and territorial reconstruction in Somalia.

His work on the 1991-92 Southern African drought and 1992-93 food crises brought out the relatively good availability of data to sound first a provisional and then a full early warning but the reluctance of the international agencies to use that time. The regional (SADC) food security/early warning unit and several governments used the data earlier and speeded up the process so that mass famine was - barely - averted.

However, the international support operation had defects beyond a slow start. It was so organised as to threaten to decapacitate national and regional institutions at least as much as to complement, had an inadequate work component to use enforced idleness toward post drought rehabilitation/vulnerability reduction and failed to have a coherent reconstruction phase linking back into renewed rural development. (On SADC initiative a 1993 conference jointly with UN will seek to address the last issue programmatically.) Related publications - 17/18/18A/19/15/13/12.

In respect to reconstruction his work suggests that its significance in rehabilitating livelihoods is seriously underestimated both in respect to potential for poverty reduction and for overall output gains. As a result it tends to be marginalised rather than made integral to national macroeconomic policy and planning. While data are necessarily scarce before internally and externally displaced persons return a decentralised, quasi participatory approach plus a set of national sectoral guide-lines can provide fairly clear programming and policy bases - at least in Mozambique and - it appears - Somalia. This approach is, however, so new that it arouses substantial national and international scepticism which seriously impedes early action or full incorporation into key Structural Adjustment parameter papers such as PPIs (priority programmes for investment) and PFPs (policy framework papers). One way to overcome this may be more systematic estimation and aggregation of overall costs, direct output gains multiplier effects and food-fiscal-forex balance impact. Related papers - 4/5/7/9/10/11.

More generally, his work suggests that absolute poverty reduction (one of the new titles for "social dimensions of adjustment") fails to be integrated into strategic policy and resource allocation processes because its human investment (or basic services), production by (and market access for) poor persons and safety net provision fronts are overly micro and inadequately estimated in national accounting terms. When this is attempted a compelling macro economic case — as well as one based on achieving stability consistent with accountable governance — can be made out. Related papers — 6/16.

Programme IV Portion

Both enhanced efficiency and enhanced flexibility of operation by African regional, national, local governmental and civil society bodies appear needed not merely for macroeconomic performance enhancement but even more for livelihood rehabilitation toward poverty reduction and more user friendly, accountable, participatory governance.

These aspects of change are not usually addressed directly in "reform" initiatives and the style of external agency and NGO initiatives and responses tends to hamper regional initiatives (e.g. SADC early warning/food security role in 1991/93 Southern African drought/food shortage crises, ongoing Mozambican decentralisation/accountability focused local government transformation initiative). External NGOs on balance behave toward domestic civil society bodies and local (or even national) governments in ways very analogous to those of bilateral and multilateral agencies to national governments. However well intentioned, this approach is inherently fragmenting, in deep tension with aims to increase domestic accountability and, in extreme cases such as Mozambique, decapacitating rather than capacity building.

Related issues arise in respect to external debt. Large debt balances which either literally cannot ever be paid or could conceivably be paid only at the expense of decades of postponing both macroeconomic growth at sustainable levels and of poverty reduction is inefficient. Present operational approaches to reducing it are partial, multi channel, scarce South personnel expensive and — especially in most SSA cases and that of the Philippines, inadequate in results. This has high distraction of decision takers, uncertainty ofinvestors (private and public) and — in SSA—excess import pricing costs. In practice the World Bank and several bilateral agencies agree but neither they nor several heavily indebted countries appear to feel much urgency in creating an informed climate of opinion, setting general parameters for debt burden and reduction requirment estimation, proceeding to case by case once for all elimination by negotiation of the excess debt service burden. Related publications—1/2/3/15/17/18A/19.
