Internal Conflict and Its International Context

by

I. Introduction

Generally appreciated these days both within international fora, particularly those within the United Nations System and its associates and within academia with a Third World Outlook is the "African Crisis". This is a term which has come to encompass phenomena such as repeated food shortages which frequently degenerate into famine situations for which emergency multilateral and bilateral food "relief" measures have had to be resorted to. Even more wellknown and perhaps even broader are the economies of Third World countries, particularly those in our Continent which seem to be incapable of taking off and in which the general trend is a downward drift towards greater dependency on external aid. What is "Crisis" about both these is that the Continent is very well endowed with resources to produce food for internal consumption and a surplus for export but that instead of this coming about emergency food aid has become the norm and surplus food produced inside the Continent has become the exception. Instead of massive external funds making it possible for Africa to tap its vast natural and human resources to achieve an economic breakthrough, the Continent is having to require more and more aid, not to advance but to pay interest on previously acquired loans which can only worsen the debt-repayment burden. How these apparent anomalies come about is obviously a matter of great international interest, but equally important is the fact that this cannot escape the critical analysis of academia.(1)

Less frequent in international fora, even those of the United Nations whose principal objective was intended to be to spare the World of Scourge of war, is the phenomenon of internal politico-Military convulsions. Geneva is busy talking about controlling strategic weapons; disarmament discussions hesitantly take plac in the UN system, but these do not seem to seriously focus on the flow of conventional weapons into Africa and the rest of the Third World. Both the UN and the Super Powers in Geneva and the allied summits seem to be busy thinking of avoiding a World War III as if war is war only when it involves Northern Hemisphere countries generally and directly. In the Far East, in the Middle East, in Southern Africa, in Chad, in South West Sahara, in Latin and South America - in all these countries what is remarkably constant are the pounding guns, the downing or launching of Migs, the movement of tanks and impressive military parades, although in none of them is any of these equipments manufactured. The same countries which tolerate these apparently inexplicable absurdities are those which are characterized by the crisis discussed above. (2)

Underneath these crossfires, not among or between nations but within our countries themselves are irritations between ethnic communities, religious identities, political affiliations, which very soon turn into open hostilities. In Uganda, in Ethiopia, in Angola, in Mozambique, in the Sudan, and in Chad, and beyond Africa in Sri Lanka, these form the bleak but prominent profiles, of their respective national lives. Yet, research as an international effort, on these matters is more conspicuous for its paucity. This monotonous barrenness of international indifference both in scholarly and policy form has only intermittently been disturbed by the establishment in recent years of an Institute for Ethnic Studies in Sri Lanka and the Peace Research Institute in Oslo, Norway.

Is there a relationship between the "crisis" previously presented and Internal Conflict now under reference? There is no doubt that a broader posing of the question would be useful because it is time we started to identify problems in their entirety. Convenience, however, as well as the requirements of the session for which this paper is prepared dictate a partial focus. To probe the international implications of internal conflict and to suggest possible remedies for them, form an underlying objective of this paper. However, it is not possible to attain these two goals without first despising of the question of what really constitutes Internal Conflict; how this phenomenon manifests itself, as well as its deeper effects on our political systems. Crucially important also is the need to conceptualize properly the relationship between the domestic situation and the international situation which is why the paper bears its present title. I propose to deal with these each in turn.

In the paper, a view will be advanced to the effect that, given the nature of contemporary international forces and given the character of the state in Africa and the rest of the Third World, the Cracks which internal conflicts betray in our domestic situations pose the greatest risk to our development as viable entities and prosperous communities and that a great need, therefore, now exists to manage the internal diversities of our states in a manner that relegates inevitable domestic disputes and disagreements to inconsequence. Meanwhile, internal conflict as a phenomenon.

II. Internal Conflict

There is hardly any need for a full-scale entry into definitional banalities over conflict. Conflict is simply conflict and it is internal, meaning within a country, if the protagonists are internally located, or, if externally domiciled, if they are internally rooted and the cause for which they conflict can be identified to be domestic. On this, there is a complication shall be demonstrated later. The conflict may range from it to communicate because of the depth of feeling and the gulf
This condition of fluidity, of possibilities of breaking and the elusive search for a new balance is fertile ground for minor disagreements to develop into active conflicts which can escalate into open hostilities. Mutual suspicions on the part of persons and groups, political and otherwise, absence of shared values and norms for attaining valued goals are in abundance. Political leaders respect nobody and honour no pledges; economic actors act without regard to the social good; professionals forget their oaths as soon as they say the last word of the same; armies define the people who finance their barracks and pay for their uniforms and their weapons as objects for manipulation, even slaughter.

Governments are not governments of countries or nations but of partialities serving particular interests. There has to be a party government, a movement government, an army government which, in conditions of zero sum game must take all. This anomic situation heightens the conflict potential in Africa and beyond.

b) Poverty

There are many ways of looking at poverty. The term generally denotes meagreness of economic resources for sustaining life; clothing, shelter, transport, diet, these are affected. To be poor is to be in the red, or near so, so far as these are concerned. But it can also denote difficiency of valuable but intangible things. Self respect, civility, respect and consideration for others, etc. When one is poor in the material sense and also in this subjective sense, one will be a thief, one will kill, one will rig elections, another will rig systems for no other reason than ones own personal glory.
Our countries are gripped by this condition. The ruthless search for accumulation; regarding public office as a licence for building up economic power and holding society to ransom. People live lives and do things as if there are no moral inhibition. In the case of Uganda of the post independence era, these attributes have their clearest manifestation. No wonder, in a space of 20 years our country has had three civil wars. Poverty of this kind can be a real nuisance and exacerbate internal tensions.

c) Ineptitude in the Management of Diversity

Nothing is perhaps more dangerous generally than a supposition that only one's side has a monopoly of virtue; has any real justification for existing, or a pretence that one can impose uniformity and achieve unanimity.

This point we touched upon earlier and must be reiterated. In political science we apply two terms to this tendency: intolerance and zero sum game. One finds it difficult to accept and live with another person, another idea, another group (tribe, party, religion). This leads to a very serious deficiency in managing differences. It leads to pretences that differences can be shut down, cultural diversity is frowned upon, and one pursues wholism to the exclusion of peculiarities.

Open hostilities among tribes, among religions, among political parties can arise from the sheer fact that one's peculiarities are not appreciated. Minor irritations become beginnings of national disasters. This is particularly so in modern circumstances when the world is more aware, where even the most illiterate and poor, yawns for freedoms and self assertion. The age of democratic ideas when people talk of human rights surely cannot mean very much unless states have learn to manage diversities. The times we live in, therefore, do add to the difficulties of reducing internal hostilities unless a serious thinking takes place on our part.

d) Psychological variables

Not losing face, protecting oneself, viewing oneself as beyond question because of unjustifiable confidence, sheer arrogance, these are psychological traits. And far too many countries have suffered when they have been led by leaders and governments whose actions can be described by these terms. Africa have had leaders who would rather destroy their parties, their armies and even their countries than have themselves lose power. Far too many of our countries have governments which think that statesmanship and glory comes only from continuing in power even when this leads to a bleeding nation and a suffering people.

People have not yet acquired the modesty to accept failure and voluntarily give their countries a chance to try someone else. These are obviously psychological and cultural problems because at their root lie questions of how one judges one's role in history, whether one considers the country to be more important than its leader or its ruling party, army or government.

They are instances of psychological pathology living side by side, in a mutually reinforcing way, with what one Ugandan scholar has termed institutional pathology. They are part of the environment of crisis which leads to internal convulsions to which we refer herein.

IV. International Context of Internal Conflict

As already indicated, our principal task in this paper is to probe the international implications of Internal Conflicts as already defined, and to suggest some remedies or to avert such conflicts.
It is quite clear that no good job in this connection is possible unless the interconnections between internal crisis and the external situation is properly conceptualized. To this we now turn.

To begin with, let us note that the burden of what was said earlier on about the fluidity and brittle quality of our political systems to which we applied the terms "Amoeba-type" and the "Bwege" is to show the rather unstable and manipulate or expose form of these polities. Terms such as "dependent", "net-colonial" and "penetrated" have been used by various scholars to put, with various degrees of intensity, this quality of our polities in sharp relief. (4)

Internal incoherence means a pervious framework where the insularity of the old polities becomes impossible. Because of this, the external element, easily intrudes into our polities. In a real sense, our political systems have leaking roofs where the external storms continue to leak long after the storms have subsided. Entry through the legitimate doors continues to take place but damage is more possible through the leakages.

The situation could hardly be otherwise because of the following. Our states were put together by an external force, colonialism, and by the time it deserted, the external constituency was so strong that formal independence had to accommodate it. Economically, politically and even militarily, our countries show very clear features of the colonial period. Even underlying assumptions in our scholarship seriously betray the colonial ethos and practices.
Many of our leading public servants, the celebrated scholars, the influential statesmen, the forces that shape our economies, our armies many of which have seized power - many of these have clear marks of colonialism on them. To make a clear separation between the domestic environment and the external circumstance would be most unrealistic, in the circumstances. But the situation is compounded by the following.

The contemporary world of which our states are a part is a much smaller world, neatly linked by strongly interlocking economic, political and military forces which find the leaking roofs much useful to their goals. Imperialism of various types, so keen to control raw materials, to control sea routes, to maintain spheres of influence, is completely at ease with this condition and will seek to protect and expand opportunity.

More important, the global constellation of forces, military, political-ideological, is such that this struggle must intensify, particularly in the Third World. The multipolar world, with its rival ideologies is also a dangerously armed world. The relative balance among the powerful countries of the North, with regard to the means of destruction, has been characterized as the balance of terror.

One remarkable aspect of the balance of terror is that, even though it does not preclude continuation or prolongation of ideological struggles and the flexing of military muscles among the powerful and rich countries, it does never-the-less almost rule out, at least experience has showed us to date, an open and direct military clash between the East and the West in the Northern Hemisphere itself.
Such confrontations, either direct or, which is more often, by proxy take place in the far off lands in Africa, Latin America, Middle East and Asia. On the surface of it is a puzzle that in the areas of the world where evidence of war, largely internal (which is why we must stress it here) is more dramatic and dangerous are precisely those countries which produce not a single weapon they use. Not even a simple bullet or a simple gun comes from within!

They are areas which find it very easy to procure military aid to prosecute internal wars. The testing ground of weapons, particularly conventional weapons which can be used for years without any threat to the supplier, is our continent. The powerful countries, aware of the consensus among themselves in matters of their mutual security have engineered the Nuclear Non Proliferation Treaty which affects weapons which few really want to use and which few countries really need for internal wars. This, they have insisted countries of the Third world to sign, giving the false impression that they are really interested in international peace and security. But no one excels them in their enthusiasm for handing out either cash or military hardware or both ostentatiously to fight against social imperialism, as the Angola case in the 1970s and 1980s demonstrated; and to fight against international capitalism and USA hegemonism as the arming of Amin of Uganda used to be justified in the 1970's. None has ever suggested any serious international effort to control or regulate the traffic of arms to the third world, which trigger-happy governments use with abandon to terrorise their own citizens and ruin the economy.
In sum we can state the interconnection between the internal situation of which Internal Conflict is a prominent aspect, and the external environment shown in the immediately preceding paragraphs, in the following way. Because, on the one hand, our political systems are internally incoherent, extremely fluid and easy to break; because aspects of their internal form are projections of the external environment; and because, on the other hand, the external environment, anxious to seize opportunity of various sorts, sharply in conflict within itself but so scared of each other, creates a situation in which the relationship between the two is of a type where the external impinges on our internal situation with a force which breaks through the leaking roofs and uses its constituencies in our midst to open wide to acquire legitimate entry for illegitimate purposes. Internal conflicts in this context can be an opening for others to acquire a foothold or could be a result of an illegitimate entry of the outsider in order to break the back-bone of a hitherto strongly fortified nationalistic people.

This kind of conceptualization does not permit us to focus only on the international implications of internal conflict. Such would be to direct our concern only to a small aspect of the problem. The point is that internal conflicts have international implications for internal conflicts, precisely because internal conflict is a product of the interaction between the two domains. It is precisely for this reason that I have preferred to talk of the International context of these conflicts.

V. Illustrations

In order to demonstrate more concretely the interconnections between the external and the internal, let us cite the following instances, some historical, others contemporary.
Recently, in a British weekly The Guardian a report appeared about the former chief of the Rhodesian Secret Service Organization, who surprisingly Prime Minister R. Mugabe had the innocence to continue as the boss of the successor body in independent Zimbabwe. He continued in this role until 1982. In the report in question, he was revealing that he and his colleagues under Prime Minister Smith had really recruited what is now the MNR in Mozambique in order to divert Frelimo Government under President Samora Machel away from active support for the Patriotic Front, particularly Mr. Mugabe's ZANU. ZANU was launching a serious offensive from the Mozambique side and Smith wanted to inconvenience them by "destabilizing" Mozambique from within.

The General was extra-ordinarily frank to the extent of saying: "we recruited them, we trained them, we paid them. They really had no programme, no mission; they just wanted money". (4)

From this obscure background, Smith did organize a force of indigenous Mozambiquans, strong enough to inconvenience Mozambique while at the same time launching an ugly search and destroy terror against the Zimbabwean people, inside Rhodesia. This was one of the conditions which forced Mugabe to enter into negotiations with Smith in late 1970s.

After Zimbabwe independence, there was no longer any facility for MNR support from Zimbabwe, but, used to foreign money, they were anxious to have another backer, and South Africa has come in earnest, pursuing exactly the same objectives for itself as did Smith's Rhodesia. It is now common knowledge that South Africa has invested heavily in the MNR, and that MNR has developed, in the process, into a formidable disruptive force against the Frelimo Government.
The economy of the country, already suffering from the after effects of a long and bitter liberation war against Portugal, has continued to deteriorate. The consequence was Nkomati, a form of hoodwinking which South Africa duped Zimbabwe into, possibly to embarrass Mozambique and weaken its solidarity with the rest of Africa. It is not surprising that Nkomati Accord was followed by the bombing of targets inside Mozambique by South Africa and the so-called accidental air crash which killed Mr. Somora Machel himself. It is true that the conflict or war in Zimbabwe is internal, between the Government and its opponents, but the money the dissidents use, the logistical support and training they receive, the weapons they use and the objectives for which the offensive is launched cannot be said to be wholly or even mainly internal.

But it is necessary to point out that the MNR, bad and misguided as it is, was fundamentally cursed by an inept handling of minority groups which were not part of Frelimo during the struggle against Portugal. Dizzy with success, after the collapse of Portuguese colonialism, Frelimo leaders descended on their apparently ineffectual opponents, some of whom had been close to the colonial state system, with a rare arrogance and exuberance. Many of them were paraded at jubilant victory rallies as traitors to whom promises of pardon were given, forgetting that public humiliation of this kind sells to very few people. In victory, Frelimo leaders thought that those who appeared weak and defeated had no cards. Those cards they have now shown to possess and the situation is pretty serious.
In short, Prelims leaders widened the cracks which did not have to widen, in the internal situation and the storm of foreign intrusion has turned the leaking roofs into floods.

From the Nigeria of the 1960s is to be found additional proof of the interconnection between the domestic and the external.

There, the country had three distinct ethnic blocks. The Hausas, a little more than one half of the total population of Nigeria but found in the Northern Region of the country which had a total of only three such Regions. The Hausas, therefore, regionally occupied only one third of the Regions of the country. They happened also to be culturally and religiously different, being Muslims while the other two Regions, the West and the East, were mainly Christian. Economically, the North, so barren and semi-desert, was the least productive of the regions, a condition which had been exacerbated by the neglect of the Region by the British colonial administration.

The East and the West were the more productive areas of the country, much of them being in the Tropical forest zones.

The East soon discovered that it had oil. Yet, despite the fact that the East and the West produced the country's wealth, and had high level manpower to run the bureaucracies of the state, politically they were marginal because democracy accorded to the majority State, especially if most of the organized as the North was, a capacity to dominate national representative organs which, in a Parliamentary democracy, gave them ability to control government.

The situation was of course worsened by the indirect rule of Britain which permitted the most minimal forms of horizontal integration among the ethnic communities of the country, least unity with educational resources, culturally and religiously most conservative... than the rest, could never-the-less, by the sheer weight of numbers control the destiny of the country. In a situation such as this, sociology will show that the dominant group, bearing these characteristics, will want to exercise power in a trigger-happy way because to lose power is to lose the only means available to compete competently in the difficult areas with those who are superior. The census will be rigged to maintain numerical superiority over a strong and threatening minority.

In the case of Nigeria of the 1960s, all these were evident. The state, once under the Hausa, had to remain so while this created nervousness among the disadvantaged. In desperation, a coup is organized which was characterized by sectarian excesses, particularly committed by the Ibo Army officers against others, mainly Hausa leaders. In response, the Hausa officers and men as well as rural communities directed their vengeance towards the Ibos, particularly the business elements spread out in the country. Hundreds of Ibos were murdered within hours without the slightest evidence that these were members of the same country. No wonder, from 1966-70, the country was engulfed into a serious civil war in which the state of Biafra composed of the Ibos was proclaimed, trying to break away from Nigeria.

There can be no doubt that within Nigeria, there were cracks in the roof of the polity. Internally the system was incoherent because of a combination of factors such as imbalance in economic development in the country, religious distinctiveness and a tradition of being separate. Those in the control of the state demonstrated an incapacity to establish a reassuring balance of hopes and advantages as between the different peoples of Nigeria.
To the extent that Nigerians failed to reassure their anxious compatriots and failed to manage their own diversities, and ended up shooting at each other in a grueling civil war, we can talk of an internal conflict. The war between Biafra and Federal Nigeria was definitely a war between Nigerians but with divergent hopes for the future. It was by all appearances internal.

But note should be taken also of the fact that indirect rule was not created by Nigerians; that uneven development between the North and the rest of the country had colonial roots which had become internalized and gave the impression of being a legacy of Nigeria. To this extent this denotes both externality and internality.

However, of the greatest importance is the fact that East/West ambitions endangered the lives of millions of Nigerians. Nigeria is an African giant that can be a prize to a non-African state having a foothold on it. Britain was the former colonial power and, consistent with the well known sphere of influence mentality among powerful states, Nigeria was within its orbit. After all, it was part of the British Commonwealth. And if Britain was present in Nigeria and wanted to continue there, if not to strengthen its base.

But Nigeria was also an independent country that had developed relations with other countries such as the Soviet Union which also wanted to strengthen its roots if not weaken the roots of its rivals such as Britain. Attention was focussed on Nigeria with the USA, somewhat a little far off, looking anxiously if Britain might slacken and give it an opportunity to step in. Countries which believe that Third World countries cannot be independent and only trade imperialism, cannot do otherwise. They have to keep watching any possible power that might jump in.
And so it was when Nigeria found itself faced with internal difficulties. Britain rushed in arms aid to assist the Federal Government in accordance to tradition. However, such aid became more substantial and long lasting when the Soviet Union extended military assistance also. The official reason was to save the integrity of a sovereign and independent Nigeria. Yet, beneath all these apparently disinterested gestures lay a sordid military and foreign policy calculation on the part of both countries to ensure that neither outshone the other by being seen to have tipped the balance in the civil war in favour of the Federal Government. (5)

In the process the Federal Government which might have been willing to reach an accommodation with its dissenting region, was turned into a belligerent because of the overconfidence which Anglo-Soviet assistance gave it. Not to be outmanoeuvred by both the Soviet Union and Britain, De Gaulle of France came to assist Biafra. However, logistical problems arising from the geophysical location of Biafra, plus the fact that no country had yet recognised the independence of Biafra, made French support both subtle and ineffective. But it gave to Biafra a false feeling of security, a feeling that better days might arrive. The end result was that this external intrusion escalated the level of violence leading to horrors against the Ibos in Biafra. Nigerians were murdering each other on an unprecedented scale, fueled by sectarian national-interest-motivated arms "aid" to the two sides of the war. In short, the Nigerian civil war was a case where externalities and internalities were combined in near mutual harmony.
The case of Uganda is more well known to us and a lot of the papers in the Conference, no doubt, will deal with it severely and in detail. In an earlier work I have myself gone into our tragedies and our irresponsibilities in some detail. (6)
There can be no doubt that our leaders in the last 25 years have failed us and their failures are, in a great measure, also attributable to us as society. (7)

A small country, with sharp religious, political and, above all, ethnic cleavages but at the same time with a large educated middle class ever ready to dwarfen the achievements of every leader, Uganda is a tragic case that has turned every available opportunity into a cost. We have truly become the Beirut of East Africa. Matters of uneven development between a military powerful Northern Region (by virtue of its dominance in the colonial and post-colonial army) but an economically near impoverished one, and an economically more affluent South, an equally educationally advanced area; the confirrance of political power on the North, the weakening of political parties as organs of free popular expression, of too many Kings and royal families in too small a country, coexisting with people with strong republican sympathies, this country has turned itself into death chambers where successive regimes and their rivals hatch plots for conquest. One, in fact, suspects that sometimes this country is gripped by a lynching hysteria.

The arms with which we fight each other are all imported, an externality. The equipment that successive secret service agencies use to invade the privacy of Uganda’s citizens are not made here. The techniques of torture which we have heard so much about are not indigenous to our country. These and others are evidence of strong externalities.
In the other hand, the ineptitude with which regimes handle opponents which frequently turns simple incidents and irritations into crisis; their inability frequently to realise that this is 20th century when many people demand the right to be different without endangering national interest; their inability to separate regime interests from national interests, these are internalities. However, there is no doubt that these two reinforce each other, hence the idea of an interaction between them.

VI. Implications of Internal Conflict

In the light of the preceding discussions it is not useful to focus on the international implications of internal conflicts. There is a two-way traffic in terms of implications. Internal conflicts definitely have international implications. They excite intervention of anxious powers seeking to control. Internal conflicts exacerbate the fluid internal situation and bring into doubt the future course of our countries. Who will hold sway, which leader or party or army will acquire supremacy, become real issues. For powers anxious to exercise influence the desire to step in and help the preferred party, internal conflict as a bonus.

The real danger of internal conflict for international peace is to trigger off competition among powerful states and the escalation of armament traffic from rival countries towards the Third World Countries. The illustrations cited above are proof enough of this danger. Internal conflicts therefore heighten international tensions.

International conflicts are also dangerous because of the refugee crisis which they worsen. One danger is the human crisis represented by refugee conditions. Statelessness, the turning of nationals into roofless people cannot be described in any other way. But this does lead to international complications when this flood of rootless people, anxious to find income and stable environments are pressured/turned into extensions of underground security networks of rival imperialist countries. In addition to being part of the human crisis and an abuse of human rights, it is dangerous to the security of their home countries as well as to everybody else. This flood of potential mercenaries at the service of the powerful, is a constant danger to our states.

But the implications are also internal. Internal conflicts expose our political systems to great pressure, and make others take advantage of our weaknesses. They do expose our independence as countries to great pressure. If we are neocolonial countries already, internal conflicts can only worsen our condition since they weaken our resource base to effect meaningful independence. Since internal conflicts are either sponsored or at least financed or subsidised by powerful states/forces outside our environments, there is a danger that the condition of dependence will be intensified and real national freedom to choose an independence course will be impaired.

In economic terms, internal conflict worsens the crisis identified in the introduction. Importation of more weapons purchased either with cash procured from sales of our commodities in conditions where terms of trade are unfavourable to our countries, or with aid from powerful forces, diverts useful money into useless things. The productive sectors of our countries are thereby starved of foreign exchange in favour of internal military adventures. Besides, internal conflict disturbs an environment for true and constructive effort and diverts the energies of the people into suicidal, self-defeating preoccupations. No country demonstrates the validity of these assertions more than Uganda's 25 years of
VII. Conclusion

In the introduction I stated that the underlying contention in this paper was that given the nature of our contemporary international life, the character of the contemporary state in Africa, internal conflict posed to our states grave risks. It impairs any development efforts and undermines our ability to stand as viable entities. It exposes our affairs to grave external manipulation. Its effects, both globally and internally, are far-reaching and depressing. What we have discussed about the interconnection between internal and external situations and the illustrations cited, should by now have shown how so true our fears are and how justified is our concern.

We cannot finish this paper without a word about how these internal conflicts may be averted or their effects minimized. In doing so, it should be recalled that conflicts or disagreements are natural and that they must always be expected. Difference is a fact of life. Disagreements and conflicts arise because of this underlying natural phenomenon. One way to confront internal conflict is not to pretend that unanimity and sameness will be achieved or consensus dictated.

One has to start from the point that diversity is natural and legitimate; recognize that it can never-the-less be dangerous, and acquire the skill of managing it in such a way that it becomes a useful and constructive resource. To recognize the legitimacy of diversity and to cultivate a spirit of tolerance for the other side will be one useful step in the road to domesticate diversity.
To explore what unites our groups and our parties; what is common among our tribes, our religions, will certainly move us further in the right direction. Inflation of our differences is most dangerous. (8)

Above all, since internal conflict is related to the goings on in the external environment in the way already presented, it is useful to view internal conflict as weakening our countries in a conflict ridden world, in which we fight each other either on behalf of others or in their economic and military interests. To be truly nationalistic and to strive for the interests of our people and countries will be a great asset because in the process we shall learn to treat each other at home in a manner that maximizes our unity and strengthens our defences against external intrusion and manipulation. When these safeguards are taken, there should be chances of controlling internal conflict.

2. It is generally known that the biggest bulk of arms trade in the world today particularly conventional weapons is with the Third World, simultaneously countries with lowest income per capita. Consult here the June issue of the Eastern Africa Social Science Review, Vol. II No. 2, 1986, particularly articles by D. Rehmato, Horace Campbell, A. Mujaju, etc.

7. See my "A Public Sector Without a Public Philosophy: The case of Uganda" paper read at the second Triennial Congress of Organization for Social Science Research in Eastern Africa held in Eldoret, Kenya, July, 1986, for a discussion of this theme.

8. These ideas on how to manage diversity were first developed in a full lecture on "Ecuminism as An Aspect of Managing Diversity in Uganda" delivered on June 1, 1987 to the Plenary Session of the Joint Christian Council Meeting in Pope Paul Memorial Hall, Rubaga, Kampala. They also follow my earlier discussion: Consensus and the Party System in Uganda, Kampala: Orbitas Publishers, 1986.
by disagreements among the parties involved, to full blown military hostilities among the same.

The contestants or belligerents may be classes, one in power controlling the state and its economy, the other(s) suffering under the subjection of the farmer but which they seek surplant. It may be hostility between communities, such as ethnic or tribal ones, sometimes religious ones, especially if they predominate in a region which is part of a country in which they are a politically perhaps also, economically disadvantaged. They thus explain their status in terms of their religious identity.

Often also, the conflict may be between undisciplined political parties, one in control of state power, the other(s) in opposition in conditions of zero sum politics where tolerance is the exception. The conflict may be directly between rival armies, conventional or guerilla, sponsored by the established disagreeable parties.

In any case, conditions of internal conflict are, frequently either directly or potentially, ones of turmoil which can be ruinous to the economy. More important, they leave big scars on the bodies of the polity because mutual animosity and bitterness may be long lasting, disrupting the process of developing stable and accepted political relations.

III. Causes of Internal Conflicts

Perhaps before we address the causes of Internal Conflicts, let me stress that the natural condition among human beings is one of conflict. People will conflict over valued resources because they have different appetites for them; such resources are frequently economic and political. They will conflict over food when it is in short supply and they will conflict over jobs. Also possible are conflicts generated by egos, psychological needs for status, recognition sometimes also adventure. In a way Hobbes may have a point in the way he describes the state of nature because, stripped of the veil of civility, human beings are capable of the excesses of other beasts. Hobbes may have been vulgar and extravagant in the way he presented the state of nature and particularly in the solutions he advocated, but certainly conflict is its predominant quality.

This means, therefore, that it is society which tries to keep conflict in check by managing intergroup relations, political and economic, on the basis of equity or to control its intensity and effects by legitimizing inequity. The potential for hostilities is always real. This must always be born in mind. What needs probing, therefore, are the thresholds, the trigger points which make organized or active conflict endemic or lead to its escalation. The following may be cited.

a) Amoeba Type Political Systems

One condition which is conducive to frequent hostilities and the turning of hitherto under-surface tensions into open hostilities in Africa is the amoeba type political systems which now exist in our continent. These are ones which, like an amoeba are small, internally fluid, constantly changing. Unlike amoeba, however, when they change establishing a new balance of stable relations becomes difficult. In addition to this condition, one must apply another image, the one of being brittle, though inconsistent this may appear to be. To be fluid and changing and to be brittle at the same time sounds impossible but impossible things happen in our systems. To this extent one can call them Bezoar political systems, because, in trying to establish a new balance breaking is a real possibility. They are so delicate, they can easily break.
