

Notes on Contributors

Olaf Bachmann is a PhD candidate at the Department of War Studies, King's College, London. He is based in London, and Palma de Mallorca, after several years of living and researching in the Central African region. His research interest focuses on the role of the military in central African state-building. This article is based on his 'War in the Modern World' master's dissertation.

Niagalé Bagayoko is a political scientist. She has done research on security sector reform in Francophone African countries and led field research in the Central African Republic, Cameroon, Mali and Senegal. She has also studied interagency and multilateral processes in post-conflict environments as well as sub-regional security mechanisms in West Africa (ECOWAS). She has done extensive research on the impact of Western security policies (France, United States, European Union) on African conflict-management mechanisms. She has taught at the Institut d'Etudes Politiques in Paris and been a Research Fellow in Security and Development at the Institute for Development Studies.

Joseph P. Chris Charley is an Assistant Inspector General with the Sierra Leone Police (SLP). He has been with the SLP since 1984. He is currently on secondment at the UN Department of Peacekeeping Operations in New York. He is also enrolled in the MA programme in Transnational Organised Crime at Staffordshire University, UK.

Freida Ibaduni M'Cormack is a Research and Information Officer with the Governance and Social Development Resource Centre, based in the Institute of Development Studies' (IDS) Knowledge Services Department. She is also a part-time DPhil student at IDS, researching regional ex-combatants in West Africa. Freida has worked in Liberia and Sierra Leone on various post-conflict reintegration and research projects. Her research interests and thematic expertise include conflict, post-conflict peace building, regionalism, and communication for development.

Thierry Nlandu Mayamba is Professor of Literature at the University of Kinshasa. A dramatist, he is known for his activities as a political activist. Thierry worked successively for Global Rights, Social Sciences Research Council, and the Security Sector Accountability and Police Reform Programme. Broad areas of research include governance, democracy and civil society with particular interest in violence against women, children in armed groups, and police reform.

Kalilou Sidibé is a lecturer of Public Law in the Faculty of Political and Legal Sciences, Bamako University. His research interests span the areas of security and defence, peace studies and political and institutional reform. He is currently undertaking a doctorate on sub-regional collective security systems in the Economic Community of West African States (ECOWAS). He is also the lead consultant for the Malian Ministry of Institutional Relations.