
Notes on Contributors

Thomas Bossert is Director of the International Health Systems Programme at the Harvard School of Public Health, and has worked extensively in Africa, Asia and Latin America.

Diana Conyers is a Research Officer at the Institute of Development Studies (IDS) with over three decades of experience as a researcher and development practitioner, mainly in Africa, focusing particularly on decentralisation and local institutional development.

Paolo de Renzio is a Research Fellow at the Overseas Development Institute, London who specialises in public sector management and reform, democratic governance, development planning and poverty analysis.

Rosalind Eyben, a Social Anthropologist, is a Fellow of IDS who spent many years working in international development agencies.

Tony Killick, an Economist, is a Senior Research Associate at the Overseas Development Institute with extensive experience in Africa.

Damoni Kitabire, an Economist, is Macro-Advisor to the Ministry of Finance, Planning and Economic Development, Government of Uganda.

James Manor is a Fellow of IDS and a specialist in politics and state–society relations, whose research has mainly focused on South Asia but also on Africa.

Rob Mellors has extensive experience as a Development Practitioner and Researcher in Africa, and is a Director of Development in Practice, a consultancy firm which specialises in local institutional development.

Oliver S. Saasa is Professor of International Economics, University of Zambia, and has done extensive research on development programmes and the architecture of aid.

Naresh C. Saxena currently works for UNICEF, and previously served as Member-Secretary of India's Planning Commission, as the head of its Ministry of Rural Development, and as the Director of its civil service academy.

Aaron Schneider is a Fellow of IDS and a specialist in public finance and political institutions, whose research has mainly focused on Latin America but also on India and southern Africa.

Rehman Sobhan, an Economist, is the founder and Director of the Centre for Policy Dialogue, a non-governmental “think tank” in Bangladesh which has produced independent analyses of relations between international aid agencies and that country's government.

Albrecht Stockmayer is Head of the Governance Programme at GTZ, the German development agency.

Ole Therkildsen, an Engineer by training, is a Professor at the Danish Institute of International Affairs who has worked extensively in sub-Saharan Africa, most recently with the Tanzanian government.

Howard White, an Economist specialising in the study of poverty, is a Fellow of IDS who currently holds a joint appointment at the World Bank.